Restaurants and themed logos that are printed on retractable sleeves with sequin or foil decals are becoming very common. They are easiest to create and adjust for shooting with a digital camera. Unfortunately, it is not possible to find an easy way to automatically import such images into the computer and create a complete customer-ready package (good luck doing that with a roll of 35mm film). The first time I used Lightroom it was during the early CS2 days (yes, it was before version 4). I was impressed back then with the way it handled large catalogs of images in ways I never expected. But, when it comes to the latest version of CS6, the 5.0 release, I am disappointed that the software hasn't progressed further in that respect. Lightroom 4 did a great job of organizing the files on my hard disk to help me find what I wanted. But, it did so the hard way. It let me select files, which caused the program to prompt me every time I wanted to see a single image. For example, I could click on a single image to show myself its thumbnail or to see it full-size, as you see in Figure 1. That's really annoying, especially when I'm trying to look at a set of images for a particular day or the entire month. I have to wade through multiple screens every single time I want to view a single image, which makes it less likely that I can remember what an image looks like with an actual name attached to it. With Lightroom 5, the program continues to behave like it's connected to a database. It only sorts and filters images on the fly. When you open a large number of files from a particular day or other date range, the program starts small and slowly works its way through all those images. In other words, you may not see the thumbnails unless you wait for the program to finish working.
