Adobe's Photoshop Elements is very good, but obviously far from perfect. It has all the capabilities you'll want a graphics editor, except for a sorting tool to organize your images and your own unique setup behaviors and shortcuts. Adobe Photoshop is a powerhouse. It's the No. 1 photo editor in the world, and it can do almost anything you can think of. You can use the full version to do pretty much everything you need for your work. For a smaller team, you can split or distribute the work between two people with two different versions. For large organizations, you'll need to leverage the cloud to share the workload. Other than the fact that it is very expensive, there's really no reason not to buy Adobe Photoshop. If only the people Adobe has hired have a clue. The update to the user interface they gave us is bad in so many ways I could write an entire review about it. Adobe says that it has shipped more than 30 million "mobile and offline" downloads since the app debuted on iOS devices in 2013, while also shipping 50 million CS6 copies and 32 million CS6 mobile apps on the App Store alone. The 5,500 new registered users are only a fraction of the actual number of authorized Photoshop users on iOS, since the program doesn't require an Apple ID - only a free Wi-Fi connection. Another reason people are buying CS6 offline is because they're sick of Apple forcing users to use in-app purchases to unlock features. Adobe has aimed for desktop simplicity in Lightroom, but it hasn't truly embodied that philosophy. The most basic functions are accessible to those with no real photographic knowledge, but even then many don't get the effect they're looking for. Frankly, you do a lot more work in Lightroom than you would in Photoshop (in the basic mode, at least; there are many ways to do some things in Photoshop). I support Lightroom because it makes my work easier, but I have no need to spend my time doing work in Lightroom because I can do it in Photoshop just as well. Even for those people who want to spend the bulk of their time in Lightroom because they want to get the best results (indeed, many people want to do just that), I wouldn't recommend you pick Lightroom over Photoshop. I mean, that's pretty much the definition of a "worse camera than your smartphone".

It serves as a layout blueprint that gives the web designer a realistic view of the website's appearance. Using this method, the web designer can see exactly what their image should look like.
